

radical geeky women

Women and queer-friendly radical tech collective looking for people to help create a better world.

We want to see more women in the tech world. We know hella women with mad skills who don't wanna deal with a scene in which male dominance is the status quo. Yeah, no wonder. We don't either.

We want to encourage your interest in technology and provide a way for you to exercise your radical politics. We'd love to be working with more awesome women who feel comfortable expressing their geeky, playful, intellectually-curious side. We play around with servers and software and programming and robotics and building stuff. We teach people and create infrastructure for the radical community.

If you've ever soldered something and enjoyed it, or if you've ever learned a programming language and felt brilliant, or if you've ever designed something that worked perfectly, we'd like to share more of that with you in an environment where men, women, and trans folks can connect.

UBEW provides mutual support to anti-authoritarian groups making radical social change through direct action, community involvement, and education. We are a geek collective with roots in the anarchist tradition, so we are explicitly opposed to all forms of domination, including sexism, racism, and classism. We strive to learn from each other and focus our skills toward creative goals, to explore and research liberating uses of technology, and to work to create a new and better world.

We host regular Free Skool Hactivism classes at SubRosa and a once-a-month Meet & Geek social the last Thursday of the month at 7³⁰pm at Bocci's Cellar. We'd love to meet you.

UBEW Radical Technical Collective • 831.272.HACK • www.ubew.org